Sana'a responds to terror threat

Embassies evacuate, international organizations scale back staff, Yemeni security releases names of 25 alleged terrorists

Mohammed Al-Hassani

SANA'A, Aug. 6 — An unspecified terror threat has Yemen all over international headlines as the U.S. Embassy in Sana'a announced the evacuation of its non-emergency staff on Monday, coupled with Yemen's release of a list of 25 people allegedly planning to carry out attacks in several Yemeni governorates. Yemeni authorities announced a YR5 million reward (about $23,000) for information leading to the capture of any of the named individuals.

The move comes after the closure of nearly two-dozen American embassies and consulates in the Middle East and North Africa on Saturday and Sunday. Sixteen missions will remain closed through the week, including four African nations that were not originally put on the list.

The British, French, German and Dutch embassies in Sana'a all also announced their closures.

"The [Supreme Security] Committee has information that some Al-Qaeda affiliates are planning several terror attacks targeting public and private institutions in various governorates during the end of Ramadan and the Eid holiday," a security official is quoted as saying in Yemen's staterun 26 September news website.

The Interior Ministry's public relations director, Dr. Mohammed Al-Qaedi, told the Yemen Times the alleged terrorists are extremely dangerous and have participated in a number of terror operations and assassinations that targeted military and security forces as well

Al-Qaedi said the militants may be targeting embassies and other foreign institutions in the coming days.

The U.S. Embassy has ordered the evacuation of non-essential staff from the country "due to the continued potential for terrorist attacks," the U.S. State Department said in a statement, and re-emphasized its warning to Americans to avoid travel to the country. It urged citizens already in country to depart immediately.

Several U.N. and international organizations have scaled back their staff. Although no agencies would go on the record to confirm the evacuations, staff have reported being ordered to leave the country for an unspecified length of time.

Security analyst Saleh Al-Sobihi told the Yemen Times that security officials announced the names of the alleged terror operatives in response to the terror warnings from the U.S. and other Western countries.

"Yemen knows it has to respond to the U.S. warnings by doing something, even if it means releasing the names of men who've been wanted for a long time," Al-Sobihi said.

A statement by the Yemeni Embassy in Washington criticizes Western governments most recent moves to evacuate.

"While the government of Yemen appreciates foreign governments' concern for the safety of their citizens, the evacuation of embassy staff serves the interests of the extremists and undermines the exceptional cooperation between Yemen and the international was vital for national security alliance against terrorism.," the statement reads.

The embassy closings followed interception of communication between high-level Al-Qaeda operatives, according to American officials, as reported by several international media outlets. Many are assuming the intelligence was gathered by the U.S.'s National Security Agency (NSA), which has come under criticism for its recently revealed mass-spying program. However, the U.S has not confirmed where the intelligence it is operating on came from.

Critics say the powerful reaction to the intercepted message is an effort to legitimize the broad powers granted to the NSA.

U.S. Senator Saxby Chambliss told NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday that the NSA's program and implied that this particular threat-which the NSA described as the most significant threat since the 9/11 attacks-would not have been detected if it weren't for the program.

"If we did not have these programs, then we simply would not be able to listen in on the bad guys," Chambliss said.

reported by the U.K.'s publication, the Guardian, critics of the program have stated the threat was not connected with the mass phone data collection. Because the communication was between two high-level Al-Oaeda leaders, the information would have been gathered under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, making Senator Chambliss' justification for the mass data collection void.

Facebook photo of allegedly abused child leads to parents' arrest

SANA'A — On July 22, a photo of a small, female child with severe burns and bruising on her buttocks and back circulated on facebook.

The photo had been taken by the wife of Jameel Al-Khwlani, a local law advisor, and it quickly went viral after he posted it on his Facebook account, eventually leading to the arrest of the child's parents, who now await prosecution.

Police investigating the case and officials at the Interior Ministry believe the four-year-old sustained severe bruising and third party inflicted burns, at the hands of her step mother, Fathia Al-Jubahi and her father Salim Mohammed Al-

The girl is currently in the custody of Brigadier Suad Al-Qatabi, the manager of the Family Protection Department at the Interior Ministry, following an order from the general attorney's office.

"I am responsible for [her] until investigations with her parents are done," Al-Qatabi said.

Al-Khwlani's wife, Najat Al-Murisi, originally obtained the photo posted on Facebook when she was approached in the Shumaila neighborhood by the child's grandmother and invited into the girl's uncle's home, where the child and her family are believed to have been staying. Al-Murisi said the grandmother had asked her if she knew of anyone who performed virginity tests. The grandmother explained that her granddaughter had been burned and was afraid that it might affect her virginity.

Al-Murisi explains that she was trying to be neighborly and brought a women to perform a check on the girl. She says she was not prepared for what she saw.

When prompted with questions on the girls' burns and bruises, Al-Murisi says the grandmother revealed the child had been allegedly abused by her stepmother.

There are no hospital records of the girl ever being treated for injuries, and Al-Murisi says the grandmother said they were too afraid of repercussions to ever bring the girl to authorities.

Al-Murisi asked to take a photo of the young victim with the grandmother's permission, who obliged.

According to the deputy of prosecution, Khalid Haza, the couple's first court hearing has not been announced yet.

The Yemen Times met with the child, who will remain with Al-Qatabi through her parents' trial. Although young and not quite able to articulately express herself, she said she had been beaten by both her parents in the past.

The step-mother denied the accusations against her.

"I did not burn [her] bottom. [She] burned herself with the iron," she said in an interview from where she was being held at Central Prison.

Jaber said a forensics team is working to determine what may have been used to cause the burns. According to Jaber, the prosecution is building a strong case against the parents as they have changed their stories several times.

During initial questioning, the stepmother said that the girl had burned herself with hot tea, Jaber

When the Yemen Times asked about the inconsistencies in her story, the woman replied, "I lied during the initial investigation because I was afraid as I have never been prosecuted before."

The accused couple said they have not found a lawyer to defend them yet. They will remain in central prison until their trial begins.

In the meantime, Al-Qatabi is focused on helping the child.

Drones kill 4 terror suspects in Marib

Story Ali Ibrahim AL-Moshki

SANA'A, August 6 - A suspected drone strike left four alleged militants dead in Marib governorate on Tuesday. The raid targeted two vehicles driving through Arq Shabwan district. Five missiles hit the first vehicle, killing all four men inside, Marib security deputy manager Ahmed Al-Salehi said.

According to Al-Salehi, the strike killed Saleh Al-Jamati, a leading terror suspect.

Missiles missed the second vehicle. The suspected militants soon abandoned the vehicle and the missiles landed near a home. The home was damaged but no casualties were reported, Al-Salehi said.

Marib resident Abdulrahman Duhaidih told the Yemen Times that aircrafts have been heavily present on American citizens to leave the in Marib skies. This, he said, has left residents panicked.

Security expert Mohammed Al-Khalid told the Yemen Times that the strike was the fourth of its kind in two weeks.

AROUND TOWN

Sa'ada War museum: A recently released survey says that about 6,500 Houthi-affiliated fighters died between 2004 and 2010 in the six wars in the North that took place between the central government and Houthi rebels. The survey, carried out by the Houthi-funded Cultural Youth Forum, also revealed the fighting left 2,852 with permanent disabilities, destroyed 15,384 houses, 3,679 farms and 466 educational and service facilities. A 12-day exhibit is going on right now in Sana'a that features photos, drawings and clay models all detailing the brutality and violence that characterized the war. Ali Al-Emad, the head of the Cultural Youth Forum and a member of the National Dialogue Conference, said the exhibition has "surprised," with a side of the wars he says isn't often told. How will you spend Eid?

nd so, the holy month of Ramadan has come to a close. Where will you be going for Eid Al-Fitr? Many Yemenis spend the holiday with friends or family, sometimes making the trek back to their home villages if they live in one of the country's cities. The Yemen Times surveyed a handful of locals in the days leading up to the holiday.

Mohand Esam, a 19-year-old studies at the Engineering College in Sana'a University. He said he will travel to Aden with his family for Eid vacation. Eid is the only time they all spend time together in the year, he said. Most of the time, they're just too busy.

Mohammed Kamal is a 20-year-old Aden native who studies at the University of Aden. He came to Sana'a from his hometown for the holy month of Ramadan. "I'm going back to Aden for Eid vacation," he said.

"I won't go anywhere, I'll stay in Sana'a with my family," said Ehab Rahal, a 19-year-old student at Sana'a University. Political and security tensions have made many Sana'anis hesitant to travel for the holiday, Ehab said.

"We used to travel in previous holidays," Fatima Obad, a 22-year-old pharmacist said. "But because of the security situation, we've decided to stay in Sana'a."

"I have my job to do during Eid," Yahia Al-Hashedi, a police officer said. "I won't go anywhere."

"My parents haven't decided yet whether to travel or not, Hesham Fathi, a 10-year-old student said. "We'll probably spend Eid vacation here in Sana'a." Fathi said that he'd like to visit local parks during the holiday.

From incense seller to incense maker, a success story hen thirtyy e a r - o l d Khairia Jamal started selling perfumes, creams and incense, she found herself walking all day from shop to shop and home to home with a heavy bag of goods that was not much lighter at the end of the day. She had few options after her husband died and left her widowed with two young children to support.

You can spot women like Khairia and others from a distance—you can smell them too. Dalalas, as they're known, walk around the city carrying their goods with a fragrant halo engulfing them.

When her husband died three years ago after suffering from complications of a tonsil infection, she was left alone to raise her two children, both under age 7 at the time.

"Neither my family nor my husband's family supported us. My situation became worse."

Her husband made YR 30,000 a month, or about $150 as an accountant in the public sector. Because he was a public sector employee, his family will continue to receive his salary, even though he has passed. The money was insufficient for all her family's expenses, including rent, water, electricity and grocery bills.

"I wanted my own business that could provide for me and my sons. I wanted to give them everything they wanted."

After setting aside a small amount of money from her husband's salary, she headed to a shopping center and purchased cosmetics and perAfter Khairia Jamal's husband died, she had to provide for her children

Despite her long days with bag in tow, she could go weeks without selling anything or only selling very little. She was not happy to be in this line of work, and it was unclear if she would be able to support herself with this venture.

"I felt very disappointed to find YR 2000 (about $10) in my purse after weeks of hard work, moving from one house to another," she said. "It never occurred to me that I would ever become a dalala."

A friend encouraged her to begin making her own products and after a short apprenticeship, she gained the skills necessary to do so.

She began making her own incense, creams and perfumes, cutting down on costs and improving the quality of the products she sold.

Yemeni women are especially known for an incense called bakhoor, made of wood and fragrances that are placed on coal and set ablaze Khairia's kitchen became her lab, a place for experimenting and creating products that would support her and her family.

"Every day I continued with the business and carried my bag full of cosmetics and products, moving from one place to another."

Neither the heavy bag, nor the scorching sun and disparaging looks could stop her from providing for her children.

"I learned the basics of the industry and soon become a talent in the field," Khairia said.

Her situation quickly changed and everything she made was in demand. The receptive reaction encouraged her to work harder and invest even more in her business. She now returns home with her bag lighter and her purse fatter.

Her products are so popular, that she's no longer only sells to women around particular neighborhoods, but is welcomed by shops around the city.

"My reputation has reached the perfume shops."

She now earns at least YR 10,000 a month and often more.

"I can give my children a good life now. I am both their mother and their father," Khairia said.

The island, which draws tourists from around the world, lacks adequate education and health infrastructure, including computer and English-language institutes. The lack of facilities hasn't held back Khalifa or his ambition.

Khalifa's journey, far from over, has been a difficult one. At age 17, he pulled together some English and began working as a tourist guide. Financial barriers and a lack of English-language resources meant he would have to wait to formally study the language.

Tourism wasn't only a means to support Khalifa, it offered relief for others in Socotra. Khalifa used his relations with tourists to help Socotrans in need.

"There were kind-hearted tourists willing to help poor people here," Khalifa said. "I took them to the most impoverished areas of the island, where a little help goes a long way.'

Khalifa said that many folks in Socotra broke down in tears when foreigners offered them help.

"It brings me comfort to see the joy in people's faces [when they receive aid], but I get depressed when I think that foreigners are helping our people while Yemeni officials never lift a single finger [for us]."

Some medicines are difficult to locate on the island, especially for the poor. Khalifa sometimes asks tourists to bring medicine with them.

Despite few resources or opportunities, Khalifa managed to leave his little island and head to the mainland. He headed to Sana'a to study at a prestigious English-language was always on his mind and he promoted tourism during his time in the capital city. He explained his island, which has been visited by more foreigners than Yemenis, to his countrymen.

Hardworking and industrious, Khalifa earned a scholarship to study international relations in Algeria. To his knowledge, he is the first person from the island to study the subject.

"I didn't receive any money from the government my first year. I couldn't even afford a pen or notebook, I was going to bed hungry," he said. "At the time, I had two choices: to push through, despite the harsh conditions, or to go back to my country. I didn't want to give up."

He added French to his list of languages and is more determined than ever to accomplish his dreams as he studies in Algeria.

"My ambition is to be a parliamentarian and to serve my island seriously and sincerely," Khalifa

One serious blockade to a better While studying in Sana'a, Socotra future for Socotra, he believes, is the growing popularity of qat on the

The recent spread of qat has frustrated Khalifa, who says there used to be a social stigma attached to the narcotic.

"Unfortunately, youth these days chew and smoke openly on the streets," he said sadly. "Qat will harm their futures—it will consume their time and leave them unmoti-

Unsurprisingly, Khalifa isn't content to sit back and watch. He tries to convince his peers to give up the habit and spend their time and resources studying a language or computer skills instead.

"Social activities and volunteer opportunities are absent on Socotra," he said. He criticized the local council for their lack of support for youth and social development.

He adds this to the list of things that need to be tackled once he makes his permanent return to his

"I'll be back to my island and I'll bring my passion to change what needs changing," Khalifa said.
